Competitive activities can be more than just performance showcases ① which the best is recognized and the rest are overlooked. The provision of timely, constructive feedback to participants on performance ② is an asset that some competitions and contests offer. In a sense, all competitions give feedback. For many, this is restricted to information about whether the participant is an award- or prizewinner. The provision of that type of feedback can be interpreted as shifting the emphasis to demonstrating superior performance but not ③ necessarily excellence. The best competitions promote excellence, not just winning or "beating" others. The emphasis on superiority is what we typically see as ④ fostering a detrimental effect of competition. Performance feedback requires that the program go beyond the "win, place, or show" level of feedback. Information about performance can be very helpful, not only to the participant who does not win or place but also to those who ⑤ do. * foster: 조장하다

Paradoxes are statements that seem contradictory but are actually ① true. Paradoxical values ② are found within cultures and between cultures. An example is the individual freedom-belonging paradox. Individualism is a strong element of American society, and so ③ does the need to belong. It seems paradoxical that both freedom and belonging are strong values of a single culture. The explanation is ④ that in an individualistic society where people want to do things their own way and go it alone, people tend to become lonely if they don't make an effort to belong. The opposite is found in Japan, where belonging is an integral part of society, and it takes an effort to behave in an individualistic way. According to the American Society of Association Executives in Washington, D.C. in 1995, there ⑤ were some 100,000 associations and clubs in the United States. Seven of every 10 Americans belong to at least one club. There is no such phenomenon in Japan.

As humans, we face the predicament of immortal souls ① trapped in mortal bodies. We are marked by an uneasy duality ② that both differentiates us from angels and evokes a host of expectations and desires. If there is a Creator, she is a cosmic tailor who carefully takes our measure and consistently produces suits that never quite fit. The secular version of this insight is not much different — even if we believe that reality is socially constructed, it is so only in an ironic sense. We rarely get the reality we favor or set out to create. Human beings are unique among animals in their tendency ③ to organize experience into plots. These plots sprout from the gaps we perceive between our lived experience and our expectations. The difference between the way things are and how they could be continually ④ cries out for explanation. Language lures us out of the present tense into ornate images of the past and future and into talk of aspirations and traditions, dreams and regret. But ⑤ what is the strength of our belief in these constructions — our degree of attachment to these beliefs — that has an overwhelming impact on how we live our lives, through its influence on our thoughts, actions, and relationships.
