Many genetic and biological mechanisms control hunger and satiety, ensuring that people will eat enough ① to meet their energy needs. Throughout most of human history, getting enough food was the primary challenge. The human body developed to function in an environment ② which food was scarce and high levels of physical activity were mandatory for survival. This situation resulted in the development of various physiological mechanisms that encourage the body to deposit energy (i.e., fat) and ③ defend against energy loss. Today's environment, however, is one in which food is widely available, inexpensive, and often high in energy density, while minimal physical activity is required for daily living. Researchers have proposed that the "modern environment has taken body weight control from an instinctual (unconscious) process to ④ one that requires substantial cognitive effort. In the current environment, people who are not devoting substantial conscious effort to managing body weight ⑤ are probably gaining weight." This means that nutrition education has an important role.

Carl Gustav Jung had an intuitive mind and sought the inside story behind appearances. He was not satisfied with the obvious, with what presented itself to our external senses, and was convinced that there was something deeper present ① that we had not yet noticed. He discerned the dark side of the human personality, the shadow behind the light, and ② saw the feminine element hidden inside men and the masculine in women. Everything hidden interested him, and he saw it as his duty ③ to bring it into consciousness. He was a thinker in search of 'soul' and 'spirit', terms that have become obscure and remote in modern times — most scholars and intellectuals find ④ themselves embarrassingly archaic. But Jung sought to bring them back to life, regarding them as dynamic and life-giving factors of the psyche. He prided himself on championing ⑤ what the rational mind shied away from.
