Grateful people are inclined to make healthy decisions. Life and sports present many situations ① where critical and difficult decisions have to be made. Selfish adults or kids do not make sound decisions as well as ② are grateful people. This includes the decision to be self-motivated. Frustrated parents ask: "How do I motivate my child to do sports or continue in sports? Sometimes my child gets ③ discouraged and does not want to put the required effort into his or her sports? What can I, as a parent, do or say to help?" It is difficult and almost impossible ④ to motivate kids or adults who are centered on their own narrow selfish desires. However, kids and adults who live as grateful people are able to motivate ⑤ themselves. They also welcome suggestions from others, even parents.

We usually get along best with people who we think are like us. In fact, we seek them out. It's why places like Little Italy, Chinatown, and Koreatown ① exist. But I'm not just talking about race, skin color, or religion. I'm talking about people who share our values and look at the world the same way we ② do. As the saying goes, birds of a feather flock together. This is a very common human tendency ③ what is rooted in how our species developed. Imagine you are walking out in a forest. You would be conditioned to avoid something unfamiliar or foreign because there is a high likelihood that ④ it would be interested in killing you. Similarities make us ⑤ relate better to other people because we think they'll understand us on a deeper level than other people.

A social enterprise is an organization that applies commercial strategies to maximize improvements in human and ① environmental well-being. Social enterprises can be ② structured as for-profit or non-profit. Many commercial enterprises would consider themselves to have social objectives, but commitment to these objectives is motivated by the perception ③ which such commitment will ultimately make the enterprises more financially valuable. Social enterprises differ in that inversely, they do not aim to offer any benefit to their investors, except where they believe that doing so will further their capacity ④ to realize their social goals. In the U.S., the term, 'social enterprise', is generally associated with 'doing charity by doing trade.' In other countries there is a ⑤ much stronger emphasis on community organizing and democratic control of capital rather than charity.
