When Daniel Boone, an expert in wilderness exploration, was asked ① whether he was ever lost, his reply was, "Disoriented for a couple of days, maybe. Lost, never." The major difference between Mr. Boone and the majority of weekend wilderness explorers is skill. Mr. Boone could always hunt, trap, find water, make a boat, and gradually ② find his way out of most wilderness problems. Average people, however, do not have the acquired wilderness skills to survive off the land. So before venturing into the great outdoors, you must realize ③ that anyone can get lost. All it takes to disorient most people outdoors ④ being a dense mist, a few unplanned turns in the woods, or nightfall. The so-called instinctive 'sense of direction' is only as good as the information used ⑤ to create that sense.

Cutting costs can improve profitability but only up to a point. If the manufacturer cuts costs so deeply ① that doing so harms the product's quality, then the increased profitability will be shortlived. A better approach is to improve productivity. If businesses can get more production from the same number of employees, they're ② basically tapping into free money. They get more product to sell, and the price of each product falls. As long as the machinery or employee training ③ needed for productivity improvements costs less than the value of the productivity gains, it's an easy investment for any business to make. Productivity improvements are as important to the economy as they ④ do to the individual business that's making them. Productivity improvements generally raise the standard of living for everyone and ⑤ are a good indication of a healthy economy

The rise of voluntary simplicity in advanced (or late) stages of capitalism, and for the privileged members of these societies, is explainable by a psychological theory of Abraham Maslow. Maslow suggests ① that human needs are organized in a hierarchy. At the base ② are basic creature comforts, such as the need for food, shelter and clothing. Higher in the hierarchy is the need for love and esteem. The hierarchy is crowned with self-expression. Maslow theorized that people seek to satisfy lower needs before they turn to higher ones, although he does not deal with the question of the extent ③ to which lower needs have to be satiated before people move to deal with higher level needs. There are some who suggest that Maslow's theory ④ has disproven because people seek to satisfy their needs not in the sequence he stipulated or even all at once. This may well be the case, but the only issue relevant here is if people continue to heavily invest ⑤ themselves in the quest for creature comforts long after they are quite richly endowed in such goods.
