The text-oriented theories dominating early-twentieth-century literary criticism paid minimal attention to the reader's role. Meaning in a literary work was ① to be found "out there," in the words on the page. Unlike earlier traditions adopting more humanistic or integrative approaches to literary texts, the so-called New Critics of the 1940s and 1950s generally insisted on the autonomy of the work itself, ② which could be interpreted through close, systematic reading and detailed textual analysis. Biography, personality, and intention of the author as well as cultural and historical contexts ③ mattered less than internal consistency, allusion, and the clever resolution of ambiguity. Taking their cue from positivist success in other fields, literary critics of this time made reading more ④ systematic by eliminating the most troublesome element in the literary process, the reader. ⑤ Confuse "the work" with its psychological and emotional effects, they insisted, constituted an "affective fallacy" that resulted in a distorting relativism and an untrustworthy subjectivism. allusion: 인용(다른 예를 끌어다 비유함) positivist: 실증주의적인

When a young police officer puts on a uniform for the first time, it almost certainly feels strange and foreign. Yet other people react to that uniform in a range of more or less predictable ways – just as they ① do to a priest or to a white-coated doctor. These reactions help to make the police officer feel a part of the uniform and more comfortable with the role that goes with ② it. This is the point of uniforms: they help people think ③ themselves into a particular way of behaving, and communicate clearly to other people what function that person is expected to perform. Our dress and appearance are a sort of uniform as well, ④ whether we like it or not. They are very powerful statements to other people about what to expect from us. Equally, they are powerful statements to ourselves about what to expect of ourselves. This, together with the way other people react to our appearance, powerfully ⑤ shaping how we feel, think and behave.

Architecture is generally conceived, designed, and realized in response to an existing set of conditions. These conditions may be ① purely functional in nature, or they may also reflect in varying degrees the social, political, and economic climate. In any case, it is assumed that the existing set of conditions is ② much less satisfactory and that a new set of conditions would be desirable. The initial phase of any design process is the recognition of a problematic condition and the decision ③ to find a solution to it. Design is above all a purposeful endeavor. A designer must first document the existing conditions of a problem and ④ collecting relevant data to be analyzed. This is the critical phase of the design process since the nature of a solution is related to how a problem ⑤ is defined.
