"Monumental" is a word that comes very close to ① expressing the basic characteristic of Egyptian art. Never before and never since has the quality of monumentality been achieved as fully as it ② did in Egypt. The reason for this is not the external size and massiveness of their works, although the Egyptians admittedly achieved some amazing things in this respect. Many modern structures exceed ③ those of Egypt in terms of purely physical size. But massiveness has nothing to do with monumentality. An Egyptian sculpture no bigger than a person's hand is more monumental than that gigantic pile of stones ④ that constitutes the war memorial in Leipzig, for instance. Monumentality is not a matter of external weight, but of "inner weight." This inner weight is the quality which Egyptian art possesses to such a degree that everything in it seems to be made of primeval stone, like a mountain range, even if it is only a few inches across or ⑤ carved in wood.

Homo habilis can be considered the inventor of human culture because of his production of handcrafted items. The handmade products ① at which he started to craft had two different functions; there were utensils needed for use in material culture and art (which was sculpture) required by spiritual life. The production of sculpture took place because a preceding spiritual life ② had happened previously. In fact it is not possible that spirituality and sculpture might have developed at the same time. The idea of creating sculpture arises from spiritual needs. Sculpture was not an end onto ③ itself but stood to symbolize certain things that referred back to life's religious aspects. The earliest sculptures were crudely made, like the utensils in the same period. These sculptures could also be ④ modified stones that had an anthropomorphic look by chance. The same stone tools and the same techniques were used to work them; they may show minor removal of material, so as to make the image look more ⑤ realistic.

Debating is as old as language itself and has taken many forms throughout human history. In ancient Rome, debate in the Senate ① was critical to the conduct of civil society and the justice system. In Greece, advocates for policy changes would ② routinely make their cases before citizen juries composed of hundreds of Athenians. In India, debate was used to ③ settle religious controversies and was a very popular form of entertainment. Indian kings sponsored great debating contests, ④ offering prizes for the winners. China has its own ancient and distinguished tradition of debate. Beginning in the 2nd Century A.D., Taoist and Confucian scholars engaged in a practice known as 'pure talk' ⑤ which they debated spiritual and philosophical issues before audiences in contests that might last for a day and a night.
