Research psychologists often work with self-report data, made up of participants' verbal accounts of their behavior. This is the case ① whenever questionnaires, interviews, or personality inventories are used to measure variables. Self-report methods can be quite useful. They take advantage of the fact that people have a unique opportunity to observe ② themselves full-time. However, self-reports can be plagued by several kinds of distortion. One of the most problematic of these distortions is the social desirability bias, which is a tendency to give ③ socially approved answers to questions about oneself. Subjects who are influenced by this bias work overtime trying to create a favorable impression, especially when subjects ④ ask about sensitive issues. For example, many survey respondents will report that they voted in an election or ⑤ gave to a charity when in fact it is possible to determine that they did not.

The process of crossing cultures challenges the very basis of who we are as cultural beings. It offers opportunities for new learning and growth. Being "uprooted" from our home ① brings us understanding not only of the people and their culture in our new environment, but of ourselves and our home culture. Although the difficulties that can arise from crossing cultures are often shocking, success stories are everywhere. Despite, or rather because of, the suffering and ambivalence we undergo when we cross cultures, we gradually find ourselves ② uniquely privileged to define ourselves and others anew with clarity and insight that we could not have cultivated without leaving home. ③ Adapting to a new and unfamiliar culture, then, is more than survival. It is a lifechanging journey. It is a process of "becoming" — personal reinvention, transformation, growth, reaching out beyond the boundaries of our own existence. The process does not require that we abandon our former personalities and the cultures ④ which we were born. Rather, it compels us to find ⑤ ourselves as if for the first time, particularly those "cultural invariants" within us — aspects that we hold dear and refuse to compromise.
